Global Hope Coalition
The Global Hope Coalition brought more than 450 business and government leaders, philanthropists, activists and icons together to create a platform to speak on violent radicals. As well as individuals, the group is made of three non-profit foundations that are based in Hong Kong, Zurich and New York.
“Mosul. Mumbai. Boston. Paris. San Bernardino. Barcelona,” states on the coalition’s website. “Violent extremism is one of the gravest dangers of our time—threatening to unravel the fabric of our societies, irreparably destroy invaluable cultural icons and jeopardize the future of intercultural relations. But around the globe, a new force is rising: men and women who are taking great risks to oppose these extremists—wherever they spread lies, bigotry and hatred.”

The 2016 gathering at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York honored eight people from around the globe who had positively affected society through persevering hate. Positive reaction to the event showed the need for a group to support and recognize the of everyday people who stand against intolerance.

Some of the strategies used are:

- “Creating and fostering a support network”
- “Establishing training programs”
- “Setting up a results based evaluation, monitoring and reporting system”
- “Enhancing fundraising capabilities”
- “Facilitating academic and leadership outreach”

The 2017 summit took place September 18 and was hosted by the Director-General of United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization Irina Bokova. She is also on the Leadership Council of GHC. State and government leaders, like the Presidents of Iraq, Ghana, France, Mugaria and Malta, joined others to launch the coalition.

"In response to violent extremism in cities worldwide, it's not only the armed forces that ultimately will bring a better, safer future,” said PR Newswire. This is a battle to win the hearts and minds of those at risk of violent extremism influence,” said Bokova. "With the newly formed Global Hope Coalition, we're coming together as a global community to help fight violent extremism and intolerance, protect cultural heritage, and encourage intercultural dialogue.”

“Arrangements were put in place to provide apartments, clothing, and English language instruction,” said on Global Hope Coalition website. “Using his business network connections, Mr. Estill also helped arrange employment and career counselling. More than 800 local volunteers were registered and donated their time to the project.”

Estill has helped more than 200 people and 58 families so far. As well, he is helping a local nine-year-old boys family dream of sponsoring a Syrian family.

Almellehan has been activists for education and Syrian refugee since she was forced to leave Syria in 2013 with her family according to UNICEF. She is also an ambassador to UNICEF. She began campaigning for more girls in schools in Jordan, where she lived in a refugee camp for three years.
“There were many girls who were forced into marriage, it was so devastating,” Almellehan told Reuters about her time at the camp according to The Hindu. “I wanted other girls to feel the hope that I felt so I went from tent to tent trying to prevent the marriages and get more girls in schools. Fleeing war and seeing your country being destroyed is one of the hardest things that children can face.”

Almellehan recently attended the G20 in Germany and spoke at the Global Citizen concert. There she met with leaders to ask for their help in securing the right for every child to have access to education, to matter who they are.
